

Problem Statement

How might we help urban working professionals who depend on their cook for kitchen management to act on low-stock signals before things run out — without requiring them to manually track or place single low-value orders — so they feel in control of their household even when they're not physically present in the kitchen?